The address of the Servian students was due, if not to the pen, at least to the collaboration of Farcy. It had been prepared some four days when he (Skobeleff) arrived in Paris. His reply was frank and unreserved, and such as was to be expected from a man who did not suppose his word would be made public. He had said nothing, however, that was not whispered by every one in Russia, even among the entourage of the emperor. No one was more astonished than he (Skobeleff) was at the excitement his speech caused. Every one sought to turn it to account, but more especially the party which is seeking to return to power in France; even Mme. Adam took a hand in it, to gratify her personal hatred against Bismarck, who had insulted her as a woman in the journals he controls. This, his so-
